Association des Chabot

No 20 Fall 2012

A type of horse-boat... This one, called “à manège,” (p. 5) was propelled by horses walking in circles...

Above, horses rotate the wheel by operating it with their hooves, which prevented them from becoming morons in the long run, they say ...

Guy Chabot, baron de Jarnac

After a lengthy preparation and a long ceremony, the opponents met. During the attack of François de Vivonne, Jarnac struck a blow with the back of his sword and split the shin of his opponent. Some say there was a crippling blow to the back of the left knee and another to the right calf. François de Vivonne collapsed and did not recover.

These unexpected and decisive blows were clever, but regulatory. To the surprise of the participants, judges took the view that the bout was within regulations and Jarnac was therefore declared the winner.

As was customary, Guy Chabot could kill his opponent, but he refused, and asked his opponent rather to recognize his wrongs. The latter refused and preferred to die. He bled to death the following night after tearing the bandages that covered his wounds. La Châtaignerie chose death rather than the shame of defeat.

King Henry II addressing the winner said. "You have done your duty. Your honor must be returned to you."

The coup de Jarnac was never contested, and its legality was never in doubt. It was not until long after the duel that the phrase took on a different meaning: "a stab in the back," a meaning that did not exist originally.
